ANALYSIS

CAE holds a share of around 59% of installed civil full-flight simulators and training devices, FlightGlobal's latest annual Civil Simulator Census shows.

That follows the acquisition of the Canadian assets of TRU Simulation + Training, which CAE recently acquired. TRU accounts for a little over 4% of the installed civil simulator market.

The latest Civil Simulator Census covers data for more than 1,500 in-service devices, predominantly full-flight simulators. Manufacturer data is unrecorded for around 12% of these devices. CAE's market share, including TRU, rises to around two-thirds when these are unknown device manufacturers are excluded.

L3Harris remains the second-largest provider of civil aircraft simulators, followed by FlightSafety International.

Narrowbodies account for more than half of the all simulators and training devices covered by the census, and widebodies for around 30%.

Airbus A320-family aircraft – including Neos – account for around one-quarter of installed civil flight simulators and devices. Boeing 737-family aircraft, across classic, next-generation and Max models, make up 22%.

Simulator occupancy and demand has been hit hard over the past year as pilots were furloughed, fleets grounded, and deliveries delayed. Like aircraft, hundreds of simulators have sat idle for much of the crisis.

CAE notes that the devices in its own training locations operated at around 50% capacity during the second half of 2020 and into the first three months of 2021. CAE was expecting to deliver 35 full-flight simulators in its fiscal year, which ends on 31 March, compared with 56 in the previous year.

For its part, L3Harris took orders for seven full-flight simulators in 2020, against 10 in 2019. In its full-year financial results, the diversified defence and aerospace technology company said the slump in the market had “significantly reduced” demand for flight training and simulators for its commercial aviation solutions business. This led to L3Harris temporarily closing some of its facilities and launching a “restructuring” drive to “align its resources with the outlook for the commercial aviation market”.

The year was notable for further consolidation activity, though, as CAE in November announced plans to buy the Canadian-based commercial aviation arm of Textron's TRU training business – the third player in mainline airliner simulators – for around $40 million.

Unlike its two competitors, which provide training, as well as making the devices, TRU is purely a manufacturer of commercial simulators. After winning a contract from Boeing to develop the 737 Max device – and installing the first in the airframer's Miami training centre in 2016 – TRU had supplied around three in 10 of all Max simulators. However, the grounding of the re-engined narrowbody in 2019 had put a brake on its growth.

CAE's new addition comes with 80 employees, an installed base of over 60 simulators, and, as well as the production facility in Montreal, training operations in France and Malaysia, and a minority stake in an Icelandic simulator centre. In a message to employees, CAE said the acquisition would boost its order backlog, broaden its airline customer base and strengthen the relationship with Boeing.

The TRU divestment follows CAE's acquisition last November of Amsterdam-based pilot training firm Flight Simulator Company for $83 million. That business operates a suite of mainly CAE-built full-flight simulators, including nine 737s and Airbus A320-family devices, a 747 and a 787, and an Embraer 190, operated in partnership with FlightSafety International. CAE followed that with the purchase for $25 million of Merlot Aero, a crew management software company.

In its latest results, CAE notes that the outlook for the sector has improved since the outset of the pandemic, reflecting “the benefits of a highly regulated aviation industry and the fundamental requirement for aviation training”. This gives many in the sector some hope. Even with a modest recovery later this year, the need for furloughed pilots to regain currency, or retrain on different types as the global fleet mix changes, could drive a hike in simulator hours.

“There will be a catch-up of delayed training,” maintains Robin Glover-Faure, vice-president sales and marketing, commercial aviation at L3Harris. “Airlines will also be changing the types of aircraft they operate with pilots of the 747-400 or other four-engined types having to learn the ropes on an Airbus A350, perhaps. There is also the return of the Max. All these factors will give a stimulus to demand.”

The resumption of Max flights and deliveries should deliver a significant boost to the market as the recovery begins. Training organisation BAA is among those planning to introduce a Max full-flight simulator at its new Spanish facility this year, with the L3Harris-manufactured device arriving in April and operational in the second half. It will join a CAE-manufactured A320 full-flight simulator installed in January, with other 737 and A320 non-full-flight simulator flight training devices to be added this year.

Unsurprisingly, the past year has seen few high-profile simulator delivery announcements. Among the exceptions, in January L3Harris said that Air China would be acquiring three of its full-flight simulators, which will go into operation at the flag-carrier's Beijing training centre within 18 months.

Notes: Information for this census is predominantly sourced from regulatory databases and company information/responses from training providers and simulator manufacturers. Where no updated data is available, previously sourced legacy information has been used. Device types are full-flight simulator (FFS), flight training device (FTD) and Integrated Procedures Trainer (IPT). Certification levels from the awarding regulator are given for the device type, running from Levels to A-D for full-flight simulators and Levels 1-7 for flight training devices
